Just Jazz

May-June 2017

Hi Friends —

This February pop singer Bruno Mars, in an online interview under the provocative headline, "Bruno Mars Says Black People Created ALL American Music!" stated, "When you say 'black music,' understand that you are talking about rock, jazz, R&B, reggae, funk, doo-wop, hip-hop, and Motown. Black people created it all. ... So, in my world, black music means everything." A Facebook friend posted the article, which I immediately shared. Why? Because I fully agree with both Mars' assertion and the only slightly exaggerated headline.

Replies poured in desperately attempting to refute this musicological fact with trivia, superficiality, and irrelevance, and exposing, in many cases, a hidden agenda. It is fascinating — and enlightening how a statement like Mars' threatens some white people, who can't accept or won't admit that "their" culture was created for them and given to them by "others." And so I was informed that ragtime innovator Scott Joplin had a German teacher. But was he the co-composer of "The Entertainer" or "Maple Leaf Rag?" I was told, "Coleman Hawkins loved Caruso and other opera singers and credited them with his concept of tone. Bird loved Stravinsky and quoted from the classics on many solos." But what does that prove, other than that these jazz giants had broad musical interests?

Here's a gem: "Without Bach, there might not have ever been blues, jazz and rock and roll as we know it, since he and his peers came up with the tonal-functional system of chords and harmony." Really? Did Bach use the blues scale or a 12-bar AAB form? Along the same lines, "Mozart used a tri-tone substitution somewhere in the development section of the Symphony in G Minor Op. 40." (I also was instructed that Beethoven used ii-V's.) So what? Appeals to classical "authorities" mean nothing except that great artists may employ similar techniques in different ways.

Try this: ""The American Songbook? Mostly white people, right. Jewish guys. There would have been no songs for jazz musicians to play if not for Tin Pan Alley." Aside from the fact that jazz musicians have written some pretty fine songs of their own to play, there would have been no Tin Pan Alley as we know it if not for black music. Irving Berlin's first big hit was "Alexander's Ragtime Band." The opening bars of "Stormy Weather" by Harold Arlen — the composer of "Blues in the Night," incidentally — unmistakably echo Louis Armstrong's "West End Blues." The Gershwin's "The Man I Love," in George's insistent blue notes and Ira's poignant poetry, invokes the artistry of Bessie Smith. Hoagy Carmichael's melodies. Johnny Mercer's lyrics. (This is almost too easy.)

Oh, wait — what about country and western? Check out Jimmie Rodgers, the first country superstar, many of whose songs had the word "blues" in the title and blues as the form. Listen to the jazz-based chart on Tennessee Ernie Ford's crossover hit, "Sixteen Tons." Johnny Cash's "Folsom Prison Blues" speaks for itself. So does the "Western Swing" of Bob Wills and his Texas Playboys. And in 1962 a mega-hit LP by Ray Charles dug up the blue roots of country and western music.

Look, I'm not saying that white people can't play jazz (as I also was accused). That would be like saying Russians can't speak French. Jazz is a musical language. You can study it, practice it, and become fluent in it. What I am saying is that jazz — and all other forms of so-called "American" music — is essentially African-American in it's origin. The bottom line: Just as black history is American history, black music is American music, and vice versa.

Stay cool, and keep list'nin',
Bob

Quotes of the Month

Many more aspects of jazz derive directly from African musical-social traditions than has been assumed. ... Every musical element — rhythm, melody, harmony, timbre, and the basic forms of jazz — is essentially African in background and derivation.
— Gunther Schuller

First of all, the music that people call Latin or Spanish is really African. So Black people need to get the credit for that.
— Carlos Santana

You leave white people alone in constant isolation for thousands of years, you know what their musical contribution is going to be? Riverdance.
— Greg Proops

NEW & RECOMMENDED CDS

Oscar Hernández & Alma Libre: The Art of Latin Jazz \(Origin\): As musical director of the renowned Spanish Harlem Orchestra, pianist-composer Oscar Hernández is a leading practitioner of the art of Latin jazz in a big band format, earning multiple Grammy awards and nominations for his work. He applies that artistry to his Alma Libre quintet with the same flavor and fire, offering ten original compositions that spotlight his own fine solo work and that of the gifted saxophonist-flutist, Justo Almaro.

Swingadelic: Mercerville \(Zoho\): The versatile big band, Swingadelic, presents the songs of Johnny Mercer with fun and flare. It's all about the lyrics, so musical director-bassist Dave Post rightly gives center stage to the voices of pianist John Bauers and the delightful Vanessa Perea. Highlights include Perea's deft handling of the seldom-heard second verse of "Too Marvelous for Words," a Louis-and-Keely tribute on "That Old Black Magic," and an appealing merger of the Mancini-Mercer Oscar-winners, "Moon River" and "Days of Wine and Roses" — in all, a most worthy homage to "America's poet."

Akiko Tsuruga: So Cute, So Bad \(AT\): Yeah, she's bad, and that's very good. If you're looking for a funky and swinging good time, this live date by organist Akiko Tsuruga's trio — with Graham Dechter on guitar and Jeff Hamilton on drums — cuts a groove that is deep and solid and everything you want. Who says good jazz can't be fun? In Tsuruga's accomplished hands the venerable and enjoyable organ trio tradition is alive and thriving.
